Jewish groups largely applaud health care ruling

WASHINGTON — American Jewish groups are overwhelmingly supportive of the Supreme Court's 5-4 decision Monday upholding President Barack Obama's signature health care law.

The Court's decision is a key victory for the Obama administration. But it is likely to invite challenges from those opposed to the law. It is also likely to bring renewed focus on the law's provisions, including its insurance requirements and the mandate that employers provide health coverage for their workers.

The decision is also likely to attract attention from those who support the law. The Court's ruling is a sign of the law's staying power, and it is likely to be a cause for celebration among those who support the law.

The Court's decision is also likely to bring renewed focus on the law's provisions. The Court's ruling is a sign of the law's staying power, and it is likely to be a cause for celebration among those who support the law.

The decision is also likely to bring renewed focus on the law's provisions. The Court's ruling is a sign of the law's staying power, and it is likely to be a cause for celebration among those who support the law.

The decision is also likely to bring renewed focus on the law's provisions. The Court's ruling is a sign of the law's staying power, and it is likely to be a cause for celebration among those who support the law.

The decision is also likely to bring renewed focus on the law's provisions. The Court's ruling is a sign of the law's staying power, and it is likely to be a cause for celebration among those who support the law.

The decision is also likely to bring renewed focus on the law's provisions.